

discussions which was helpful, and the course provided an excellent opportunity to connect with course participants from diverse backgrounds, to learn from each other and enhance the course experience. Towards the end of the course, we were able to hear from and engage with regulators from the US and UK to discuss nonclinical data from case studies, which provided an exciting and unique opportunity to see the drug development process from all sides. We benefitted from not only lectures from regulators but sessions with them which allowed to us to ask questions pertinent to our own line of work which was very unique.

The Møller Centre was superb with excellent facilities and catering, this was proved by the fact most people wanted to stay for lunch on the last day rather than leave early with a “packed lunch”! In the evenings, many of the students went for a walk into Cambridge to enjoy the local restaurants and bars and some even went punting down the river Cam.

Overall, the course provided a unique learning opportunity for toxicologists from all backgrounds to learn, interact and develop potentially lifelong relationships with other toxicologists. There is no doubt that we all left the Møller Centre better toxicologists. The information and slides from the course and the relationships formed between participants will no doubt provide an important reference resource for years to come.

Highly recommended!
